David C. Hamilton

In my work, parents often claim they will do anything for their child's well-being, however, that claim can be tested when it requires a relinquishment of their control. I recently learned just how true that was during a family emergency of my own. When my 8-week-old daughter's weight gain began to slow and medication failed to help, our pediatrician encouraged us to head to CHOP for in-patient testing and monitoring; she wanted to make sure there weren't any lingering complications from issues identified at birth.

My wife and I desperately did not want to simply hand over our daughter to the staff at CHOP, but I had to remind myself to practice what I preach to parents daily and set aside my feelings for what was best for her. Fortunately, all tests were clear and she is back home with us, but the memory of the (temporarily) empty bassinet remains.

As parents, we are forced to make decisions every day that place our children's interests before our own. As family law attorneys, we are here to help you understand your options and which may be best for your children. Although the desired outcome involves difficult choices, we'll get through it together.

A QUICK LOOK AT SOME OF THE MOST CURRENT TRENDS AND FIGURES IN FAMILY LAW.

A study by the University of Washington indicated divorce filings spike in August. Why?

1 An unfulfilled belief that the summer season, with its warmer weather and relaxed pace, will rekindle a relationship.

2 Additional pressure put on a relationship due to summer's emphasis on family bonding and travel.

3 Couples unwilling to give bad news to kids during their school vacation wait until the end of the summer to communicate the decision.

4 August is when children leave for college, leaving empty nesters alone to reevaluate their relationship.

5 Parents believe August gives the family plenty of time to adjust to the news before the start of the holiday season.

6 Summer means events and activities in fun places, where someone unhappy in a relationship often meets someone new.
